STUART, HENRY WINDSOR VILLIERS (1827-1896), of Dromana; politician; was ordained, 1860, but surrendered his orders, 1873, and was returned to parliament as M.P. for Waterford, 1873-4 and 1880-5; accomplished valuable work in Egypt, 1883; his reports published in a blue-book; wrote largely on Egypt. [lv. 85]

STUART, JAMES, fourth DUKE OF LENNOX and first DUKE OF RICHMOND (1612-1655), son of Esmé, third duke of Lennox; studied at Cambridge; a staunch supporter of Charles I, but more from loyalty than devotion to his policy; granted Charles I large sums in the civil war; created Duke of Richmond, 1641. [lv. 85]

STUART, JAMES (1713-1788), painter and architect; known as 'Athenian Stuart'; originally employed in painting fans for Lewis Goupy [q. v.]; visited Rome, 1741, and Greece, 1751, with Nicholas Revett [q. v.], the result of their expedition to Greece being published in 'The Antiquities of Athens', 1782, which led to the introduction of Greek architecture in London, Lord Anson's house in St. James's Square, built by Stuart, being perhaps the first of that style; F.R.S. and F.S.A.; architect and authority on classical art; member of the Dilettanti Society. [lv. 86]

STUART, JAMES (d. 1793), major-general; brother of Andrew Stuart [q. v.]; saw much active service from 1758 to 1775, in which latter year he entered the employment of East India Company in Madras; major-general, 1781; while attacking Ouddalore, owing to rivalry of the civil powers, was seized by the Madras government and sent home to England. [lv. 88]

STUART, JAMES (1741-1815), general; served in the American war of independence; in campaigns under Sir Eyre Coote, Sir William Medows, and Cornwallis; commanded expedition against Ceylon, which he secured, 1796; took Seringapatam, 1798; general, 1812. [lv. 89]

STUART, JAMES (1764-1842), historian of Armagh; B.A. Trinity College, Dublin, 1789; called to the Irish bar; author of 'Historical Memoirs of Armagh', 1819; editor of newspapers and poet. [lv. 89]

STUART, JAMES (1775-1849), writer to the signet; studied at Edinburgh University; a keen whig politician, and attacked violently by the 'Beacon' and by the 'Glasgow Sentinel', 1821; killed in a duel the writer of one of these articles, Sir Alexander Boswell, 1822, and after a trial, which excited much interest, was acquitted; after a visit to America, 1828, published 'Three Years in North America', 1833, displaying a strong bias in favour of the Americans; inspector of factories, 1836. [lv. 90]

STUART, SIR JAMES, first baronet (1780-1863), chief-justice of Canada; solicitor-general of Lower Canada, 1801, but resigned and joined the opposition in the House of Assembly, 1809, and procured impeachment of the chief-justices Sewell and Monk; active in procuring the union of the two provinces; appointed attorney-general for Lower Canada, 1826; impeached, 1831; created baronet, 1841; chief-justice of Canada, 1841. [lv. 91]

STUART or STEWART, SIR JOHN, of Darnley, SEIGNEUR OF AUBIGNY (1365?-1429), as one of the commanders of the Scottish force helped to defeat the English at Beaugé, 1421; granted the seignury of Aubigny, 1422. [lv. 92]

STUART, JOHN (1700?-1779), superintendent of Indian affairs; went to America with General James E. Oglethorpe, 1733, and was in Fort Loudoun during the French war, when it was besieged by the Cherokee Indians; made terms with Oconostota, who, however, treacherously massacred the garrison; general agent and superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern department, 1763; took part with the royalists in the war of independence; died in England. [iv. 98]

STUART, JOHN, third EARL OF BUTE (1713-1792), succeeded his father as earl, 1733; educated at Eton; married Mary, only daughter of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu [q. v.], thereby acquiring eventually the Wortley estates; elected a representative peer of Scotland, 1737; took no part, however, in politics during his earlier years, but amused himself in Bute with agriculture, botany, and architecture; introduced by an accident, 1747, to Frederick, prince of Wales, at whose court his influence soon became paramount; assisted the Princess of Wales in imbuing Prince George (George III) with Bolingbroke's principles of absolute monarchy; great scandal caused by his intimate relations with the princess; on accession of George III became practically prime minister; made secretary of state, 1761; got rid of Pitt, his policy being to make peace, but notwithstanding was obliged to declare war with Spain, 1762; succeeded Newcastle as first lord of the treasury, whose retirement he effected by proposing withdrawal of the Prussian subsidy, 1762; K.G., 1762; made secret overtures for peace, and induced Henry Fox [q. v.] to accept leadership of the House of Commons, with whose aid and by bribery he carried addresses approving the terms of the preliminary treaty of Fontainebleau; lost popularity by the treaty of Paris, 1763, being even suspected (probably without foundation) of accepting bribes from France; his unpopularity increased by the older tax, 1763; resigned, 1763; retained, with George Grenville as prime minister, George III's confidence, and intrigued against that minister, but unsuccessfully; finally retired from George III's business, May 1765; voted against the Stamp Act, 1766, and subsequently travelled abroad incognito. His ability for intrigue did not make up for his lack of administrative talent and of parliamentary experience. He was a patron of literature, giving Dr. Johnson a pension of 300*l.* a year, and a student of botany, privately printing 'Botanical Tables.' [iv. 92]

STUART, SIR JOHN (1759-1815), lieutenant-general; son of John Stuart (1700?-1779) [q. v.]; count of Malda; born in Georgia, North America; educated at Westminster School; took part in the war against the American colonists, and was present at surrender at Yorktown, 1781; served in the unsuccessful campaign against the French, 1793-5; took part in the capture of Minorca, 1795; at the battle of Alexandria (1801) gained the victory by his action at a critical moment; ensured decisive victory over the French general Reynier in Calabria, 1806, and received pension of 1,000*l.* per annum; made K.B. and Count of Malda; took Ischia and Procida and captured Murat's gunboats, 1809, after which he retired to Messina; repulsed attack of the enemy with great loss near Messina, 1810; complained of want of support from Lord Liverpool and resigned; G.O.B., 1815. [iv. 98]

SWETNAM, JOSEPH (fl. 1617), called the woman-hater; author of 'The Arraigning of lewd, idle, froward and unconstant Women,' 1615, which provoked several rejoinders. [lv. 200]

SWETNAM, SWEETNAM, or SWEETNAM, JOSEPH (1577-1623), jesuit and religious author. [lv. 201]

SWEYN or SVEIN (d. 1014), king of England; and Denmark; son of Harold Blaataend, king of Denmark; baptised according to the conditions of peace dictated by the Emperor Otho, 965; appears to have cast aside Christianity and made war against his father, who was killed in a battle with him, 986, on which he became king; soon, however, driven from Denmark by Eric the Victorious, he became a sea-rover, invading England with Olaf, 994, when an unsuccessful assault on London was made; remained for some time ravaging the country, but after further adventures was restored to his kingdom, c. 1000; invaded England, 1003, in consequence of the massacre of the Danes on St. Brice's day, 1002, in which his sister Gunhild and her family are said to have perished; stormed Exeter and ravaged Wiltshire; burnt and plundered Norwich, 1004; again arrived, with Canute, his son, in the Humber, 1013, ravaged the land, and made a complete conquest of the country; accepted as 'full king,' 1013; died soon afterwards, according to the legend, pierced by the spear of St. Edmund, whom he had derided. [lv. 201]

SWEYN or SWEGEN (d. 1052), eldest son of Earl Godwin [q. v.]; earl of Oxfordshire, Berkshire, Gloucestershire, Herefordshire, and Somerset; took the side of his father in his quarrel with Edward the Confessor; was outlawed several times and made a pilgrimage barefoot to Jerusalem for the murder of his cousin Beorn, 1052. [lv. 203]

SWIFT, DEANE (1707-1783), author; cousin of Jonathan Swift [q. v.]; B.A. St. Mary Hall, Oxford, 1736; published 'An Essay upon the Life, Writings, and Character of Dr. Jonathan Swift,' 1755. [lv. 228]

SWIFT, JONATHAN (1687-1745), dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, and satirist; cousin of Dryden and son of Jonathan Swift by Abigail (Erick) of Leicester; born at Dublin after his father's death; grandson of Thomas Swift, the well-known royalist vicar of Goodrich, who was descended from a Yorkshire family, a member of which, 'Cavaliero' Swift, was created Baron Carlingford, 1627; educated at Kilkenny grammar school, where Congreve was a schoolfellow, and at Trinity College, Dublin, 1682; neglected his studies, showed an impatience of restraint, was publicly censured for offences against discipline, and only obtained his degree by the 'special grace'; attributed his recklessness himself to the neglect of his family, for whom he felt little regard; joined his mother at Leicester on the troubles which followed the expulsion of James II; admitted into the household of Sir William Temple, who had known his uncle Godwin, c. 1692, where he acted as his secretary; introduced to William III and sent by Temple to him, to convince him of the necessity for triennial parliaments, 1693; wrote pindarics, one being printed in the 'Athenian Mercury,' 1692, which, according to Dr. Johnson, provoked Dryden's remark, 'Cousin Swift, you will never be a poet'; chafed at his position of dependence, and was indignant at Temple's delay in procuring him preferment; left Temple's service, returned to Ireland, was ordained, 1694, and was given the small prebend of Kilroot; returned to Temple at Moor Park, 1696; read deeply, mostly classics and history, and edited Temple's correspondence; wrote (1697) 'The Battle of the Books,' which was published in 1704, together with 'The Tale of a Tub,' his famous and powerful satire of theological shams and pedantry; met 'Stella,' Esther Johnson [q. v.], who was an inmate of Temple's family at the time; went again to Ireland on the death of Temple, 1699; given a prebend in St. Patrick's, Dublin, and Laracor, with other livings; made frequent visits to Dublin and London; D.D. Dublin, 1701; wrote his 'Discourse on the Dissensions in Athens and Rome' with reference to the impeachment of the whig lords, 1701; in his visit to London, 1706 and 1707, became acquainted with Addison, Steele, Congreve, and Halifax; entrusted (1707) with a mission to obtain the grant of Queen Anne's bounty for Ireland; wrote some pamphlets on religious or church subjects; published 'Letter on the Sacramental Test,' 1708, an attack on the Irish presbyterians, which, though anonymous, injured him with the whigs; in disgust at the whig alliance with dissent, ultimately went over to the tories on his next visit to England, 1710; attacked the whig ministers in pamphlets, in the 'Examiner,' November 1710 to June 1711, and wrote the 'Conduct of the Allies,' 1711; became dean of St. Patrick's, 1713; had already commenced the 'Journal to Stella,' had become intimate with the tory ministers, and had used his influence in helping young and impoverished authors, including Pope and Steele; returned to England, 1713, to reconcile Bolingbroke and Harley, but in vain; wrote more pamphlets, notably 'The Public Spirit of the Whigs considered,' 1714, in reply to Steele's 'Orissa,' but at length gave up all for lost and retired to the country; left for Ireland, 1718, after the fall of the ministry and the death of Queen Anne; his marriage to Stella, an incident which still remains unproven, and also his final rupture with 'Vanessa' (Miss Vanhomrigh, whose acquaintance he had made in London), supposed to have taken place about this time; his rupture with Vanessa the cause of her death, before which she entrusted to her executors his poem 'Cadenus and Vanessa,' which relates the story of their love affair; though always contemptuous of the Irish, was led, by his personal antipathies to the whigs, to acquire a sense of their unfair dealings with Ireland; successfully prevented the introduction of 'Wood's Halfpence' into Ireland by his famous 'Drapier Letters,' 1724; came to England, 1726, visited Pope and Gay, and dined with Walpole, for whose behoof he afterwards wrote a letter complaining of the treatment of Ireland, which had, however, no effect on the minister; broke with Walpole in consequence; was introduced to Queen Caroline, but gained nothing by it; published 'Gulliver's Travels,' 1726; made his last visit to England, 1727, when the death of George I created for a moment hopes of dislodging Walpole; wrote some of his most famous tracts and some of his most characteristic poems during these last years in Ireland; kept up his correspondence with Bolingbroke, Pope, Gay, and Arbuthnot, and though remaining aloof from Dublin society, maintained good relations with Lord Carteret, the lord-lieutenant; attracted to himself a small circle of friends, and was adored by the people; set up a monument to Schomberg in the cathedral at his own expense, spent a third of his income on charities, and saved up another third to found a charitable institution at his death, St. Patrick's Hospital (opened, 1767); symptoms of the illness from which he appears to have suffered all his life very marked, c. 1738; buried by the side of Stella, in St. Patrick's, Dublin, his own famous inscription, 'ubi seiva indignatio niterius cor laerare nequit,' being inscribed on his tomb. Dr. Johnson, Macaulay, and Thackeray, among many other writers, were alienated by his ferocity, which was, however, the result of noble qualities soured by hard experience. His indignation at oppression and unfairness was genuine. His political writings are founded on common sense pure and simple, and he had no party bias. His works, with the exception of the letter upon the correction of the language, 1712, were all anonymous, and for only one, 'Gulliver's Travels,' did he receive any payment (200*l.*). A large number of publications appear to have been attributed to him by different editors without sufficient authority. [lv. 204]

SWIFT, ROBERT (1634?-1599), chancellor of Durham; of the same family as Jonathan Swift [q. v.]; B.A. St. John's College, Cambridge, 1653; fellow; chancellor of Durham, 1661. [lv. 227]

His writings are collected in four volumes. [lv. 258]

SYLVESTER, JOSUAH (1563-1618), poet; translator of Du Bartas; educated at the school of Hadrian & Saravia [q. v.] at Southampton, where he acquired a sound knowledge of French, and subsequently entered a trading firm; is supposed to have been for some time steward to the Essex family; made groom of his chamber by Prince Henry, c. 1606; became secretary to the merchant adventurers, 1618, and had to reside at Middelburg. Meanwhile he had accomplished a considerable amount of literary work, chiefly translations of the scriptural epics of the Gascon Huguenot, Guillaume de Saluste, seigneur du Bartas, in the rhymed decasyllabic couplet. He had a full sympathy with his original, and his work was much admired by contemporaries, and doubtless influenced Milton indirectly, but after the Restoration was considered pedantic, and ceased to be read. The translation of Du Bartas's 'Canticle' appeared, 1590, of 'La Semaine,' 1592, and the first collective edition, 1606; author of several other works, mainly religious, but including accounts of Henry of Navarre and St. Louis. [lv. 260]

TALHAÏREN (1810-1869). [See JONES, JOHN.]

TALLESIN (A. 550), British bard; perhaps a mythic personage; first mentioned in the 'Saxon Genealogies' appended to the 'Historia Britonum,' c. 690. A mass of poetry, probably of later date, has been ascribed to him, and legends told concerning him, printed as 'Hanes Tallesin' in the 'Cambrian Quarterly Magazine' for 1833. The village of Tallesin in Cardiganshire has sprung up near the supposed site of his grave. The 'Book of Tallesin,' fourteenth century, is a collection of poems by different authors and of different dates. [iv. 346]

TALLENTS, FRANÇOIS (1619-1708), ejected divine; fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge; received presbyterian ordination, 1648; orate of St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, 1653; ejected, 1662; after Monmouth's rebellion confined in Chester Castle, 1685; presented purse of gold to James II in recognition of the indulgence, 1686; author of sermons and controversial religious works. [iv. 347]

TALLIS, THOMAS (1510?-1585), musician; organist at Waltham Abbey, 1540; granted half the lease of the manor of Minster in Thanet by Queen Mary, 1557; with William Byrd [q. v.] was given, by Queen Elizabeth, a monopoly of music-printing for twenty-one years, 1578; buried in Greenwich parish church, since pulled down. During life some five of his anthems were published in Day's 'Certaine Notes,' 1560, and he composed eight tunes for Archbishop Parker's 'Psalter,' 1567, and a ninth, intended for 'Veni Creator Spiritus.' Others were published in Barnard's 'Selected Church Music,' 1642, Lowe's 'Short Directions for Cathedral Service,' 1661, Bryce's 'Cathedral Music,' 1760 and 1763, and in other collections, but many of his works remain in manuscript. He excelled in his sacred vocal compositions; he was one of the first to compose settings of the Anglican 'service.' He represents the reaction from the excessive complications usual in his day, his litany is 'one of the finest pieces of ancient church music extant,' and the responses and some of his hymn-tunes, including 'Glory to Thee, my God, this Night,' are in general use, while his seven-voiced 'Misereere' is a 'masterpiece of speculative art' (Ritter). [lv. 348]

[lvi. 110]

THEOBALD or TEDBALDUS (d. 1161), archbishop of Canterbury; came of a Norman knightly family settled near Thierceville; monk of Bec; abbot, 1137; archbishop of Canterbury, 1138; after some hesitation joined the Empress Maud against King Stephen, but returned to his allegiance to Stephen on the king's release, 1141, and crowned him at Canterbury; attached to his household rising men of legal and political talent, including Thomas (Becket) [q. v.]; introduced study of civil law into England, and brought over Vacarius of Mantua [q. v.], the famous jurist; involved in disputes with Henry, bishop of Winchester, who as legate till the death of Pope Innocent II, 1143, caused a division of authority; engaged in disputes with St. Augustine's and Christ Church convent, Canterbury; went to Rome, 1148, and being supported by Bernard of Clairvaux obtained satisfaction from the new pope, Eugenius III, and was made legate by 1150; was refused by Stephen permission to attend the pope's council at Rheims, 1148, but managed to cross the Channel secretly in a boat; on his return was exiled and his revenues seized; forced to go back to France; published an interdict of the pope which was little observed; returned to England, became reconciled to King Stephen, and received submission of the monks at St. Augustine's; refused to crown Stephen's son, Eustace, king, 1152, and was imprisoned, but escaped to Flanders; recalled by Stephen under threat of an interdict; brought about reconciliation between Stephen and Henry, duke of Normandy, 1153, and on death of Stephen maintained order in the kingdom till Henry's arrival, 1154; recommended Archdeacon Thomas Becket to Henry II as chancellor to secure continuity in his ecclesiastical policy, his hopes, however, being disappointed; wished him to be his successor; buried in Canterbury Cathedral. During his primacy he successfully resisted the efforts of the monasteries to rid themselves of episcopal control. He supported Stephen as the king recognised by the pope, but opposed him whenever he resisted the will of the church, the church becoming under him more powerful and more dependent on the pope. He may be said to have been the founder of canonical jurisprudence in England. [lvi. 113]

THEOBALD, LEWIS (1688-1744), editor of Shakespeare; became an attorney, but soon abandoned the law for literature; published an ode on the union, 1707, and translations of Plato, Æschylus, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and Homer, poems, essays, biographies, and dramatic works; accused of scandalous plagiarism in respect of his 'Perfidious Brother,' 1715; published 'Shakespeare restored, or a Specimen of the many Errors as well committed as unamended by Mr. Pope in his late Edition of this Poet,' 1728, exposing Pope's incapacity as a critic; made the hero of the 'Dunciad,' and ridiculed in the 'Miscellanies,' 1727-8, at the same time that his best corrections were incorporated in Pope's second edition of Shakespeare; defended himself in 'The Author,' 1729; produced the 'Double Falsehood,' a tragedy, 1727, as a work of Shakespeare's, though probably from his own pen; edited the posthumous works of Wycherley, and contributed notes to Cook's 'Æsiod,' 1728; failed in his candidature for the poet laureateship, 1730; contributed valuable emendations on Æschylus, Athensius, and other Greek writers, to 'Miscellaneous Observations on Authors, Ancient and Modern,' by Zachary Pearce [q. v.], 1731; published an edition of Shakespeare, 1734, which raised him to the front rank of Shakespearean commentators; pursued by poverty; wrote various tragedies and operas, and was engaged on an edition of Beaumont and Fletcher at the time of his death. [lvi. 118]

[Suppl. iii. 388]

VICTORIA, QUEEN OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, and EMPRESS OF INDIA (1819-1901), granddaughter of George III, and only child of George III's fourth son, Edward Augustus, duke of Kent (d. 1820), by Mary Louisa Victoria, fourth daughter and youngest child of Francis Frederick Antony (1750-1806), reigning duke of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld (afterwards Gotha), and widow of Ernest Charles, reigning prince of Leiningen (d. 1814), was born at Kensington Palace, 24 May 1819. She was baptised, 24 June, Alexandrina Victoria, the first name being after Alexander I, czar of Russia, who was one of her sponsors. She lived from 1820 with the Duchess of Kent at Kensington Palace. Her early education was undertaken by Fräulein Louise Lehzen (created Hanoverian baroness, 1827), and, from 1827, by the Rev. George Davys, and many tutors and mistresses who worked under his supervision. Music and art were favourite studies. In 1830 the Duchess of Northumberland was appointed her governess. From 1832 onwards the Duchess of Kent and the princess made extended tours in England. She was confirmed at Chapel Royal, St. James's, 1835, celebrated her coming of age, 24 May 1837, and on 20 June 1837 succeeded to the throne, on the death of her uncle, William IV. The queen met her first privy council on the day of the king's death, and she was formally proclaimed on the following day. On her accession the union between England and Hanover, which had existed since 1714, was dissolved. She was instructed in the duties of her station by Lord Melbourne, the prime minister and leader of the whig party, who also undertook the duties of private secretary for all public business. Melbourne thus became the queen's constant companion. In private matters the Baroness Lehzen continued to fill till 1842 the secretarial office for private business, which she had filled before the queen's accession. Baron Stockmar, who had been sent by King Leopold to direct the princess's political education as soon as she reached her majority, was also in attendance on her. On 18 July she took up her official residence in Buckingham Palace. On 20 Nov. she opened her first parliament, reading her own speech, as was her custom until her widowhood, whenever she attended in person. Parliament granted her an annuity of 385,000*l.* She had in addition the revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall (about 27,500*l.* annually); the duchy of Cornwall, which passed to the Prince of Wales at his birth in 1841, ultimately produced more than 66,000*l.*, while the yearly income from the duchy of Lancaster rose to more than 60,000*l.* In 1839 the queen discharged the debts of her father, the late Duke of Kent. The coronation took place on 28 June, 1838. In the early months of 1839 the queen was subjected to much unfavourable comment owing to her passive attitude towards Lady Flora Hastings [q. v.], daughter of the Marquis of Hastings, who was lady-in-waiting to the Duchess of Kent at Buckingham Palace, and was improperly suspected by some of the queen's attendants of immoral conduct. In the same year, 1839, Melbourne's whig ministry resigned and the queen commissioned Sir Robert Peel, the leader of the conservative opposition in the lower house, to form a government. Peel, in consultation with his friends, decided that the ladies holding the higher posts in the queen's household must be displaced if the conservative ministers were to receive adequate support from the crown. The queen, misunderstanding Peel's intentions, refused to accept his proposals. He accordingly declined to proceed to the formation of a government, and the whigs returned to office. In October 1839 the queen's first cousin, Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, and his elder brother Ernest, who had already stayed at Kensington in 1836, visited Windsor, and on 15 Oct. the queen offered Prince Albert marriage. The marriage took place on 10 Feb. 1840. Prince Albert received a grant from parliament of 30,000*l.* annually, and the queen gave him, by royal warrant, precedence next after herself. The first attempt on the queen's life was made, 10 June, 1840, by Edward Oxford, a potboy, who was found to be insane. The queen's first child, Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa, was born on 21 Nov. 1840. In 1841 the queen came for the first time into conflict with Palmerston, the foreign minister, whose Eastern policy seemed likely to bring about a war between England and France. In June 1841 parliament was dissolved and the ensuing election produced a tory majority. Melbourne resigned and Peel was called upon to form a ministry. On 9 Nov. 1841, the queen's second child, Albert Edward, prince of Wales (now Edward VII), was born. In June 1842 the queen made her first railway journey, travelling from Slough to Paddington. On 30 May and 3 July second and third attempts on her life were made by John Francis and John William Bean. In the autumn of this year the queen paid her first visit to Scotland, journeying by sea from Woolwich to Granton. Princess Alice was born on 25 April 1843. In September the queen visited Louis-Philippe at Chateau d'Eu, near Tréport. This was the first occasion on which the queen had trodden foreign soil, and the first occasion on which an English sovereign had visited a French sovereign since Henry VIII appeared on the Field of the Cloth of Gold at the invitation of Francis I in 1520. Prince Alfred was born 6 Aug. 1844. Louis-Philippe returned the queen's visit in October 1844, this being the first time that a French monarch voluntarily landed on English shores. The queen opened the new Royal Exchange, London, 28 Oct. 1844. In the autumn of 1845 she visited Germany for the first time, and stayed at Rosenau, Prince Albert's birthplace. In 1845 the state of agricultural distress which prevailed throughout the United Kingdom forced Peel to advocate the repeal of the corn laws, a step which he and his party were pledged to oppose. The queen firmly supported him, but Peel deemed it just that the opposite party, which had lately championed the reform, should carry it out. He accordingly resigned, and the queen sent for Lord John Russell. Russell, however, was unable to face difficulties chiefly arising from the distrust in which Palmerston was held by the queen and many members of his own party. Peel resumed power, and on 26 June 1846 the corn-law bill passed its third reading in the Lords, but on the same night the government was defeated on the second reading of a coercion bill for Ireland, and Peel's resignation followed. Lord John Russell formed a new ministry, and the queen, with much misgiving, agreed to Palmerston's return to the foreign office. In the meantime the Princess Helena was born, 25 May 1846.

In 1844 the queen had purchased the estate of Osborne, in the Isle of Wight; the foundations of her palace there were laid in 1845, and the whole was completed, 1851. In 1848 the queen leased Balmoral House, and purchased it in 1852, when Balmoral Castle was begun; it was finished in 1864. Here a part of every spring and autumn was spent during the rest of the queen's life. In June 1849 the queen made her first visit to Ireland, going by sea from Cowes to the Cove of Cork, on which she bestowed the name of Queenstown. Subsequently she stayed four days in Dublin. Her third son, Arthur, was born on 1 May 1850.

Meanwhile the breach between the foreign minister, Palmerston, and the crown had been growing wider, and in 1850 the queen was compelled to state definitely her demands in regard to his future conduct. She required, firstly, that he should inform her distinctly of his proposed course of action in any given case, and, secondly, that he should not arbitrarily modify or alter any measure which had once received her sanction. Palmerston affected painful surprise; but his method of procedure underwent no permanent change. In February 1851 the government was outvoted on a question of electoral reform, and Lord John Russell resigned. The conservative leader, Lord Stanley, afterwards Lord Derby, declined to form a government, and Russell was recalled. In this year the queen threw herself with great spirit into the arrangements connected with the Great Exhibition. The removal of Palmerston from the ministry followed at the end of this year, and was a source of relief to the queen. On 3 Dec. Prince Louis Napoleon, by a coup d'état, made himself absolute head of the French government. The queen and Lord John viewed with detestation Napoleon's accession to power and the means of its accomplishment. Palmerston, however, expressed his approbation to the French ambassador Walewski, without communicating either with the queen or with his colleagues. Lord John, who proposed that for the present England should extend to Napoleon the oldest neutrality, summarily demanded Palmerston's resignation. The seals of the foreign office were accordingly transferred to the queen's friend, Lord Granville. Early in 1862 a militia bill occasioned the defeat and consequent resignation of the ministry. Lord Derby formed a conservative government, with Disraeli as chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons. A general election in July left the conservatives in the minority. The Duke of Wellington died on 14 Sept. In December Disraeli's budget was rejected by a small majority, and Lord Derby resigned. A coalition ministry of conservatives and liberals was formed by the queen's wish by Lord Aberdeen, the foreign and home offices being taken respectively by Clarendon and Palmerston.

An alliance between England and France became inevitable late in 1853, owing to the position of affairs in eastern Europe. In the autumn Russia pushed her claims to protect the Greek Christians of the Turkish empire with such violence as to extort from Turkey a declaration of war. British popular opinion demanded the immediate intervention of England in behalf of Turkey. Napoleon offered to join his army with that of England, and the king of Sardinia promised to follow his example. But other foreign sovereigns endeavoured privately to influence the queen in favour of peace. Her attitude to all her continental correspondents was irreproachable, but the rumour spread that she and her husband were employing their foreign intimacies against the country's interest; and as the winter of 1853-4 progressed without any signs of decisive action on the part of the English government, popular indignation burst in its fullest fury on the head of Prince Albert. The tide of abuse was temporarily checked when, 27 Feb. 1854, the queen announced in the House of Lords the breakdown of negotiations with Russia. War was formally declared next day, and France and Sardinia renewed their promises of alliance. The queen evinced great personal interest in the progress of the Crimean war, and initiated or supported all manner of voluntary measures for the comfort of the troops. In January 1855 the government was defeated on a hostile motion for inquiry into the management of the war, and the queen reluctantly bade Palmerston form an administration; subsequently, however, she gave him her full confidence, and when the treaty of peace was signed, 30 March 1856, she acknowledged that the successful issue of the war was mainly due to him. In April 1856 the Emperor Napoleon visited the queen at Windsor, and was dissuaded from his intention of taking command in person of the French troops in the Crimea. In May the queen distributed with her own hands war medals to the returned soldiers, a function that had not previously been performed by sovereigns. In August the queen and Prince Albert visited the emperor at Paris; this was the first occasion on which an English sovereign had entered the French capital since the infant Henry VI went to be crowned in 1422. In June 1856 the queen instituted the Victoria Cross for acts of conspicuous valour in war, and herself decorated the first recipients on 26 June 1857. On 25 June 1857 the queen conferred on Prince Albert the title of prince consort. During this year (1857) the progress of the Indian mutiny caused the queen acute distress. In February Palmerston resigned on the defeat of a bill making conspiracy to murder, hitherto a misdemeanour, a felony; this had been introduced in consequence of a plot hatched in England to destroy the emperor and empress of the French by an explosive bomb which was thrown in the Opera House in Paris. Lord Derby formed a new ministry. In August the queen visited Napoleon at Oberbourg, and afterwards made an extended tour in Germany. On 25 Jan. 1858 her eldest daughter, the princess royal, married Prince Frederick, afterwards Crown Prince of Prussia. While the Indian mutiny was in course of suppression the East India Company was abolished, its territories and powers transferred to the crown, and the administration placed in the hands of the secretary of state, who was assisted by a council of fifteen. The scheme for the actual reorganisation of the Indian government, in which the queen was deeply interested, received the royal assent, 2 Aug. 1858.

The queen's tranquillity of mind was at this time greatly disturbed by the part Napoleon was playing in European politics. He had threatened to join the king of Sardinia in an endeavour to expel Austria from Lombardy and Venetia. The prospect of war between France and Austria gave the queen peculiar anxiety owing to Austria's proximity to Prussia, with whose reigning house her daughter had recently become allied by marriage. Austria took the initiative by declaring war on Sardinia, and Napoleon immediately entered the field in behalf of Sardinia. The queen was successful in dissuading Prussia from interference. The prompt triumph of French arms brought hostilities to a close, but the queen's fears of the sequel were increased by a change of ministry, which brought Palmerston into power as premier, and Russell as foreign secretary. Palmerston and Russell agreed in a resolve to serve the interests of Italy at the expense of Austria. The queen, however, contrived to persuade her ministers to adopt a policy of strict neutrality. In May 1859 a volunteer force was called into existence, and in July 1860 the queen personally inaugurated the National Rifle Association as a complement to the volunteer movement; in the same year she instituted the queen's prize (250*l.*), which was thenceforth awarded annually. In September 1860 the queen and prince consort made a second journey to Coburg to visit Stockmar, who had lived there in retirement since 1857. On 4 Feb. 1861 the queen opened parliament in person; this was the last occasion in which she delivered with her own voice the speech from the throne. On 16 March the queen's mother died at Frogmore after a brief illness. In the later months of this year the health of the prince consort gradually failed. Early in December he persuaded the British ministers to adopt a conciliatory attitude towards the United States respecting the Trent affair, and on 14 Dec. he died.

The sense of desolation which the queen experienced on her husband's death never wholly left her. She long remained in retirement, and never ceased to wear mourning for him. In the two years that followed her bereavement she lived in complete seclusion, but engaged assiduously in official work. General the Hon. Charles Grey, a younger son of the second Earl Grey, who had been since 1846 private secretary to the prince consort, was appointed to the same post in the queen's service, and continued in this capacity until his death in 1870. His place was then taken by General Sir Henry Ponsonby, who died in 1895, and was succeeded by Colonel Sir Arthur Bigge, who survived the queen. On 1 July 1862 the queen attended, in deep mourning, the marriage of Princess Alice to Prince Louis of Hesse. At the close of this year it was proposed to confer the crown of Greece upon her second son, Prince Alfred. The offer caused her much perplexity. The crown was finally given to George, son of Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg (who became king of Denmark on 15 Nov. 1863); he was brother of the affianced bride of the Prince of Wales. The marriage of the Prince of Wales took place, 10 March 1863. The queen visited Germany in the autumn, and while at Coburg had an interview with the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, who was returning from Frankfurt, where a conference of German sovereigns had been held to consider a form of confederation of the German states, which seemed likely to exclude Prussia. The queen endeavoured to influence the emperor of Austria in behalf of Prussia. Towards the close of 1863 the queen gave close attention to the struggle brought about by the conflicting claims of Germany and Denmark to the duchies of Schleswig-Holstein. Her sympathies were with Germany, while those of her ministers and people were with the Danes. In February 1864 hostilities broke out between Austria and Prussia on the one hand and Denmark on the other. The Danes were promptly defeated. The queen succeeded in enforcing on her government a policy of strict neutrality. In June the German allies occupied the disputed duchies.

Meanwhile a feeling had been growing throughout the country that the queen's prolonged seclusion was contrary to the nation's interest. She replied guardedly to the popular outcry in a letter to 'The Times' newspaper (1864), stating her desire to meet the wishes of her subjects so far as her health, strength, and spirits might allow. The queen was acutely distressed at the deaths of Palmerston on 18 Oct. 1865, and of King Leopold on 10 Dec. Palmerston's place as prime minister was taken by Lord John Russell. On 10 Feb. 1866 the queen opened parliament in person. Later in the year the disputes between Prussia and Austria in regard to the final allotment of the conquered duchies of Schleswig-Holstein culminated in a desperate conflict between the two powers. The struggle hopelessly divided the queen's family in Germany. The queen bade Lord Russell take every step to prevent war. In June war was declared, and the queen's perplexity was increased by the defeat and subsequent resignation of Russell's government on the question of reform of the franchise. Russell retired from public life; he died 4 June 1878. In July the conservative leader, Lord Derby, formed a new ministry, with Disraeli as chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons. Prussia's triumph in the war was quickly assured; Hanover was converted into a Prussian province, and by the victory at Sadowa, near Königgrätz (3 July 1866), Prussia was finally placed at the head of the whole of north Germany, and Austria was compelled to retire from the German confederation.

With the object of perpetuating her husband's memory, the queen published in 1867 a minute account of the early years of the prince consort, which had been prepared under her direction by her private secretary, General Grey. In 1870 she entrusted the continuation of this biography to (Sir) Theodore Martin; this work appeared in five volumes, 1874-80. The queen's 'Leaves from a Journal of our Life in the Highlands, 1848-61,' appeared privately in 1867, and publicly in 1868. A second part, 'More Leaves,' followed in 1883, covering the years 1862-82.

In February 1867 the queen opened parliament in person. In May of the same year she laid the foundation of the Royal Albert Hall, which was erected in her husband's memory. In this year she encouraged the government to settle the question of franchise, and Disraeli's reform bill passed through parliament. In July 1867 the queen received visits from the khedive of Egypt and the sultan of Turkey. In February 1868 Disraeli became prime minister in succession to Lord Derby. In April Gladstone brought forward his first and main resolution in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish church. The government resisted him and was defeated, and Disraeli tendered his resignation. On 5 May Disraeli announced in parliament that the queen had decided, on her own responsibility, to reject his resignation, and to dissolve parliament as soon as the arrangements for appeal to the electors, newly enfranchised under the reform bill, were complete. Disraeli's action in giving the queen the choice of two alternatives excited hostile comment. In August she paid her first visit to Switzerland, travelling incognito under the name of the Countess of Kent. In a general election at the close of this year Disraeli's government was defeated. In December Gladstone became prime minister. The first measure which he introduced was the bill for the disestablishment of the Irish church, and despite her disapproval of it the queen recognised that its adoption was inevitable. Accordingly she exerted, through Archbishop Tait, her influence against the opposition of the House of Lords, and the bill was passed (June 1869).

In 1870 the queen watched with close attention the struggle between France and Germany, and when, in 1870, Napoleon declared war, she regarded his action as wholly unjustified. On his overthrow, however, she welcomed the Empress Eugénie to England, and when the emperor joined the empress at Chislehurst, 1871, the queen extended to him a sympathy which continued until his death, 9 Jan. 1873. In 1870 Cardwell, the secretary for war, instituted a scheme for the reorganisation of the army, and on 28 June, with some reluctance, the queen signed an order in council deposing the commander-in-chief from his place of sole and immediate dependence on the crown. Later in the year her ministers caused her prerogative to be exercised in order to circumvent the opposition of the House of Lords to a bill passed in the House of Commons for the abolition of military promotion by purchase. She opened parliament in person, February 1871. On 31 March Princess Louise was married to the Marquis of Lorne, eldest son of the Duke of Argyll; this was the first time in English history that the sovereign sanctioned the union of a princess with one who was not a member of a reigning house since Mary, sister of Henry VIII, married, in 1516, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. During this period much anti-royalist feeling was fostered in certain classes of the community in England. In March 1873 Sir Charles W. Dilke, M.P. for Chelsea, introduced into parliament a motion which aimed at a complete reform of the civil list. The proposal was rejected by a large majority, but the feeling which inspired it remained alive in the country until the queen conspicuously modified her habits of seclusion. In March 1873 Gladstone resigned on the defeat of his Irish university bill, but on Disraeli's refusal to take his place he returned to office.

In January 1874 the queen's second son, Prince Alfred, married at St. Petersburg the Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna, Czar Alexander II's only daughter. The match was of little political importance. In the same month parliament was dissolved and a conservative government came into power, with Disraeli as prime minister. With Disraeli the queen was in complete sympathy, and it was in conformity with his views in regard to British intervention in foreign politics that she exerted her influence in 1875 to avert the hostilities which again threatened between France and Germany. In 1875 the Prince of Wales, as representative of the queen, made a state tour through India, and in May 1876 the designation of Empress of India was conferred on her by the Royal Titles Bill. In February 1876, and again in February 1877, the queen opened parliament in person. In 1876-8 the queen gave much attention to the position of affairs in eastern Europe. The subject races of the Turkish empire in the Balkans had threatened the Porte with revolt in 1875, and there was the likelihood that Russia, to serve her own ends, might come to the rescue of the insurgents. Beaconsfield adopted Palmerston's policy of 1854, and declared that British interests required the maintenance of the sultan's authority inviolate. Gladstone, who had in 1876 announced his retirement from public life, emerged from his seclusion to oppose the bestowal on Turkey of any English support. The queen used, without success, her private influence to dissuade Russia from interference, and on Russia's declaration of war with Turkey, April 1877, she firmly supported Beaconsfield in a diplomatic struggle which brought Russia to the brink of hostilities with England. The question was settled by the congress of Berlin, June 1878, when Beaconsfield, who acted as English envoy, obtained, in his own phrase, 'peace with honour.'

In April 1879 the queen paid her first visit to Italy, staying at Baveno on Lago Maggiore. The queen again opened parliament in person in February 1880, and in March, after the dissolution, she visited Germany. The ensuing election brought the liberals into power, and the queen reluctantly commissioned Gladstone to form a government. She was seriously perturbed by plans for the further reorganisation of the army. She was unrelenting in her admonitions to the government to take vigorous steps in Afghanistan, 1880, and in the Transvaal, 1880-1, and the policy of peace which followed the defeat of General Colley at Majuba Hill, 28 Feb. 1881, conflicted with her views. On 19 April 1881 Beaconsfield died, and the queen treated his loss as a personal bereavement. During the war in Egypt occasioned by Arabi Pasha's rebellion (1882) the queen continued to urge her ministers to energetic action. After the pacification of Egypt she devised a new decoration of the royal red cross for nurses who had rendered efficient service in war. The queen's life was for the fifth time threatened by assassination at Windsor on 2 March 1882, when Roderick Maclean, a lunatic, fired a pistol at her, fortunately without effect. On 4 Dec. 1882 the queen inaugurated the new law courts in the Strand. In 1883-4 Egypt, which was now practically administered by England, became the centre of renewed anxieties. In 1883 the inhabitants of the Soudan revolted. The English ministry decided to abandon the territory, but undertook to relieve several Egyptian garrisons remaining in the Soudan in positions of great peril. General Gordon was despatched to Khartoum, the capital of the disturbed district, with a view to negotiation with the rebels. He was besieged in Khartoum by the mahdi's forces. The queen repeatedly warned the government of the necessity for sending him relief, and in the autumn of 1884 a British army was sent out under Lord Wolseley, but Gordon was killed before a rescue could be effected. The queen reproached her ministers with the death of Gordon, which she regarded as a public disaster. Throughout 1885 she maintained her interest in the operations in the Soudan. The queen lent her support to the Franchise Bill, which, after some opposition from the lords, was passed concurrently with the Redistribution of Seats Bill before the end of the year (1884). She spent the spring of 1886 at Aix-les-Bains, and on her return journey visited Darmstadt and made the acquaintance of Prince Henry of Battenberg, who on 23 July married the queen's youngest daughter, Princess Beatrice. In June the government was defeated on its budget proposals, and Gladstone resigned. Lord Salisbury at once took office as prime minister, but the general election which followed the dissolution in November left the conservatives in a minority, and in January 1886 Salisbury's government was outvoted. Five days previously the queen had opened parliament in person, as it proved, for the last time. Gladstone resumed power, and at once committed his party to the policy of home rule for Ireland. The queen disliked the proposal, and Gladstone's Home Rule Bill was decisively rejected by the House of Commons (7 June). At Gladstone's instance parliament was dissolved; he resigned without meeting the new parliament, where his party was small, and Lord Salisbury for the second time formed a government. In this year (1886) the queen manifested great interest in the Colonial and India exhibition at South Kensington organised by the Prince of Wales (afterwards King Edward VII). On 21 June 1887 and the following days she took part in the public ceremonies in celebration of her jubilee, and on 6 July she laid the foundation-stone of the Imperial Institute, which was erected by public subscription to commemorate the fifty years of her reign.

In March 1888 the queen for the first time visited Florence, and afterwards proceeded to Charlottenburg, the palace of the dying Emperor Frederick. In March 1889 she stayed at Biarritz, and thence visited the queen-regent of Spain at San Sebastian. This was the first occasion on which an English sovereign had visited that country, though Charles I and Charles II went thither as princes. In July the approaching majority of the Prince of Wales's eldest son and the approaching marriage of his eldest daughter compelled the queen to appeal to parliament on the question of suitable provision for the third generation of her family. Precedent justified public provision for all children of the sovereign's sons, and the queen agreed to forego any demand in behalf of her daughters' children. The matter was settled, with Gladstone's assistance, by a grant to the Prince of Wales of 36,000*l.* annually for his children's support. Gladstone's intervention was always remembered by the queen with gratitude. In August 1889 she welcomed her grandson, the German emperor, William II, on his first visit to England since his accession to the throne. The emperor caused the queen to be gazetted honorary colonel of his first regiment of horse guards, on which he bestowed the title of Queen of England's Own. In 1892 a general election returned a majority of home rulers, and Gladstone filled the post of prime minister for the fourth time. In September 1893 his Home Rule Bill, which had passed through the House of Commons, was rejected by the House of Lords. In March 1894 the queen accepted Gladstone's resignation and chose Lord Rosebery to succeed him. In this year the government made further changes in the war office, which strictly limited to five years the tenure of the post of commander-in-chief, and thus finally disposed of the queen's cherished fiction that the head of the army was her permanent personal deputy. The ministry fell in June, and Lord Salisbury resumed office as premier and foreign secretary, with Mr. Chamberlain as colonial secretary. In the spring of 1895 the queen was at Cannes, in 1896 and 1897 at Nice, and in 1898 and 1899 at Olmetz. On 22 June 1897 she took part in a state procession through London to celebrate her 'diamond jubilee,' the completion of the sixtieth year of her rule. During the closing years of her reign the queen gave close attention to the numerous expeditions in which her armies were engaged, and she was gratified when the rebellion in the Sudan was finally crushed at the battle of Omdurman, 2 Sept. 1898. On the outbreak of the Boer war in 1899, when she was convinced that the peace which she was always anxious to preserve could not be maintained, she exerted her utmost energy to urge her ministers to conduct hostilities with all possible promptitude and effect. To encourage her soldiers she went, in the spring of 1900, for the fourth time to Ireland, whence the armies in the field had been largely recruited. She held her last drawing-room in Buckingham Palace, 4 May. She gave her assent to the Australian commonwealth bill, 27 Aug. In October a general election was deemed necessary by the government, and on the return of a conservative majority Lord Salisbury remained prime minister, but resigned the foreign secretaryship to Lord Lansdowne, formerly minister of war.

Throughout the summer the queen experienced acute distress at the accounts of suffering which reached her from South Africa, and her personal sympathy with her troops was intensified by the death of her grandson, Prince Christian Victor of Schleswig-Holstein, from enteric fever contracted in active service. In the autumn of 1900 the queen showed signs of general physical decay, and on 22 Jan. 1901 she died. Her body was conveyed with military honours from Osborne through London to Windsor, and was placed (4 Feb.) in the mausoleum at Frogmore, which had been completed in 1868, and already contained the remains of her husband. On the day following her death her eldest son was proclaimed King Edward VII.

Among the most notable portraits of the queen are paintings or drawings by Sir William Beechey, R.A., 1821; Sir George Hayter, 1833 and 1838; Sir David Wilkie, 1839; Sir Edwin Landseer, 1839 and 1866; F. Winterhalter, 1845 and other years; Baron H. von Angell, 1875 (of which a copy by Lady Abercromby is in the National Portrait Gallery, London), 1888, and 1897; and M. Benjamin Constant, 1900. Sculptured presentations include a bust by Behnes, 1827; a plaster bust by Sir Edgar Boehm (in National Portrait Gallery); a statue at Winchester by Mr. Alfred Gilbert, R.A.; and a statue at Manchester by Mr. Onslow Ford, R.A. A national memorial in sculpture to be designed by Mr. Thomas Brook, R.A., with an architectural setting by Mr. Aston Webb, A.R.A., is to be placed in the Mall opposite Buckingham Palace. His 'Posthumous Works' appeared, 1728. [xlii. 195]

WYCK, JOHN (1652-1700), painter; born at Haarlem; came to England when young; enjoyed great reputation for battle and hunting scenes. [xlii. 202]

WYLIFFE, JOHN (d. 1384), religious reformer and theologian; born at Hipswell; probably fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, and subsequently (in 1361) master; probably not identical with John Wyclif, who was appointed warden of Canterbury Hall, Oxford, 1366, and who was perhaps at Merton College, Oxford, and rector of Mayfield; vicar of Fillingham; prebendary of Westbury, 1361; held benefice of Ludgershall, 1368; wrote, 1366 or 1376, controversial tract, 'Determinatio quedam de Dominio contra unum monachum'; graduated doctor of theology, c. 1372; received as canon of Lincoln licence from Pope Gregory XI to keep Westbury prebend, even after obtaining prebend at Lincoln, 1373; sent to Bruges as ambassador to treat with papal legates at Ghent about non-observance of statute of provisors and other matters, 1374; rector of Lutterworth, c. 1374; gained favour of Duke of Lancaster and Henry, lord Percy, by his opinions about the relations between temporal and spiritual power; summoned before archbishop and suffragans in St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on charge of heresy, but, the court having broken up in confusion, had no sentence passed on him, 1377; again tried, at Lambeth, and with similar results, 1378, his accusers formulating charges (including his assertion that the ecclesiastical ruler, and even the Roman pontiff, may legitimately be corrected or even accused by subjects and laymen) suggested by his hostility to the secularity of the mediæval church; instituted his 'poor preachers' and the translation of the whole bible into English for the first time, himself translating the gospels, probably the whole New Testament, and possibly part of the Old Testament, the work being edited by John Purvey [q. v.] and completed by him before 1400; peremptorily rejected transubstantiation, c. 1380, and was forbidden to teach his doctrine in Oxford University, 1381, while a court, summoned by the archbishop, 1382, condemned theses of his which implied that he held that all authority, secular and ecclesiastical, was derived from God, and was forfeited when the possessor of it was in a state of mortal sin, that he denied the doctrine of transubstantiation, on which the power of the priesthood was fundamentally based, and that he condemned monasticism in all its forms; left Oxford, where, in spite of royal and ecclesiastical commands, he was not treated with severity, and retired to Lutterworth, occupying himself with preaching, translating the bible, and writing controversial pamphlets; buried at Lutterworth, but his body disinterred, 1428, and thrown into the river Swift. He was famous as a philosopher before he became famous as a theologian, and famous as a theologian before he became a heresiarch, and the connection between his philosophy and his theology was neither external nor accidental. He discovered in nominalism the seat of all theological error, and his practical religious teaching was above all things ethical. The more important of his Latin works (which with two exceptions have been published by the Wyclif Society) are: I. (in early life) 'De Logica', 'De Compositione Hominis', 'XIII Questiones logice et philosophice', 'De Ente Predicamentali'; II. (up to 1379) 'De Incarnatione Verbi', 'De Dominio Divino', 'De Dominio Civili', 'De Ecclesia', 'De Officio Pastoralis' (published by Lechler, 1863), and 'De Officio Regis'; III. (from 1379) 'Dialogus' or 'Speculum Ecclesie Militantis', 'De Eucharistia', 'De Simonia', 'De Apostasia', 'De Blasphemia', 'Opus Evangelicum', and 'Trialogus' (published by Lechler, 1869). 'Select English Works of Wyclif', edited by T. Arnold, appeared 1869-71, and 'English Works of Wyclif hitherto unprinted', by F. D. Matthew, 1880 (Early English Text Society). [xlii. 202]

OF
NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY
TWENTIETH CENTURY
1901-1930

NOTE

THE Epitome of 1901-1911 was made under the supervision of Sir Sidney Lee, and was published in 1913. It is now combined with the Epitomes of 1912-1921 and 1922-1930.

When referring from the Concise D.N.B. to the main Dictionary, it is important to note that the latter now comprises five alphabetical series:

1. The D.N.B. original issue, containing obituaries from the earliest times to the dates of publication (1885-1900).
2. Supplement containing additional obituaries, mostly 1885-1900.
3. The Twentieth Century D.N.B. Obituaries 1901-1911.
4. The Twentieth Century D.N.B. Obituaries 1912-1921.
5. The Twentieth Century D.N.B. Obituaries 1922-1930.

Thus while the Concise D.N.B. is in two alphabets only—before and after 1901—the year of death is the necessary clue to the place of any life in the main Dictionary.

nephew, Mr. A. J. Balfour, July 1902; died at Hatfield; monument in Westminster Abbey.

A close student of science and theology, he was president of the British Association in 1894, and was interested in electricity in later life. Contemning the impracticable and scornful sentiment and cant, he was a master of satire. Cautious in diplomacy, he regarded democracy as inimical to individual freedom, had strong faith in the historical continuity of government, and was severe critic of radical idea of progress; his foreign policy was one of pacific imperialism. G.O.V.O., 1902; D.C.L. Oxford, 1869; LL.D. Cambridge, 1888; hon. student of Christ Church, 1894. Portraits by Richmond, Millais, Watts, Herkomer; statues at Hatfield (by Sir G. Frampton) and at foreign office; Lives by Traill (1890), S. H. Jeyes (1896-8), Pulling (1885), and How (1903); 'Essays: Foreign Politics' were posthumously republished (1905) from the 'Quarterly Review', to which he contributed thirty-three articles, 1860-83.

CHAMBERLAIN, SIR CRAWFORD TROTTER (1891-1902), general; brother of Sir Neville Chamberlain [q.v.]; cadet in Bengal army, 1857; served in Afghan war (1839), in Sikh war (1845-9), and Mowund expedition (1844); promoted lieutenant-colonel for services in Indian Mutiny; C.S.I., 1866; commanded Gwalior district, 1866-9, and Oudh division, 1874-9; promoted general, 1880; G.O.I.E., 1897.

CHAMBERLAIN, HOUSTON STEWART (1855-1927), political writer; nephew of Sir N. B. Chamberlain [q.v.] and Sir C. T. Chamberlain [q.v.]; lived successively at Dresden, Vienna, and Bayreuth; student of Wagner; cut himself adrift from England and became naturalized as a German, 1916; his reputation as a thinker mainly rests on 'Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts' (1899), published in English as 'The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century' (1911); this is a broad survey of European culture, not simply a glorification of everything German.

CHAMBERLAIN, JOSEPH (1836-1914), statesman; educated at University College School; member of screw-manufacturing firm in Birmingham, 1854-74; early became interested in question of social reform, which made him adopt radical views; chairman of National Education League of Birmingham, 1868, and of National Education League, 1870; mayor of Birmingham, 1873-5; helped to improve housing and sanitation of Birmingham; and to develop municipal social reform generally; colleague of John Bright in parliamentary representation of Birmingham, 1876; formed close offensive and defensive alliance with (Sir) Charles Dilke [q.v.]; carried out reorganization of liberal party, 1877; became president of board of trade and entered second Gladstone cabinet, 1880; out of sympathy with majority of colleagues in ministry of 1880-3; held strongly patriotic and national opinions on foreign affairs combined with extreme radical views on internal matters; opposed to policy of coercion in Ireland and entered into negotiations with Charles Steward Parnell [q.v.] resulting in Kilmainham treaty, 1882; strongly opposed introduction of Irish Land Purchase Bill without accompanying Irish Local Government Bill, 1885; opposed Egyptian policy of government and advocated relief of General Gordon, 1884; deplored loss of Cameroons to England, 1884; proved his capacity at board of trade by responsibility for two measures relating to merchant shipping (1880). Electric Lighting Bill (1881), Act for reforming law of bankruptcy (1883), Patent Act (1888), and Merchant Shipping Bill (1884); gave great offence to Queen Victoria by violence of his language at this time and incurred remonstrance from Gladstone for advocacy of unauthorised liberal programme; had friendly discussion with Gladstone on subject of liberal programme, Oct. 1885; M.P. West Birmingham, 1885; president of local government board in third Gladstone cabinet, Feb.-March, 1886; resigned on introduction of Home Rule Bill which he had consistently opposed; voted against bill, June 1886; sacrificed future leadership of liberal party and even risked political extinction rather than comply with demands of Parnell; resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill (Dec. 1886) dispelled his hopes of organizing new national party; went on mission to United States to negotiate treaty regarding North American fisheries, Nov. 1887-March 1888; visited Egypt and was impressed by benefits accruing to that country from British occupation, 1889; joined third Salisbury cabinet as secretary of state for colonies, 1895; as secretary kept two objects in view: first, the tightening of the bond between Great Britain and the self-governing colonies, and secondly, the development of the resources of the crown colonies together with an increase of trade between them and Great Britain; gave much attention to improving position of West Indies; waged successful campaign on question of health in tropical countries and was instrumental in setting on foot two special schools of tropical medicine; during his secretaryship British possessions in West Africa extended by effective occupation of territory behind Gold Coast and Lagos and by placing of Royal Niger Company's territories under control of the colonial office (1900); most memorable work performed in connexion with Dominions, especially South Africa; soon after taking up office confronted with difficulties created by Raid of (Sir) Leander Starr Jameson [q.v.]; unjustly accused of complicity with Raid; his position with regard to South Africa made easier by appointment of high commissioner, Sir Alfred (afterwards Viscount) Milner [q.v.], in whom he could place entire confidence, 1897; proposed meeting between Milner and President Kruger to discuss grievances of Transvaal Uitlanders, chief of these being franchise question; Bloemfontein conference (May-June 1899), honest attempt on part of British authorities to reach modus vivendi, broke down through Kruger's intractability; in spite of conciliatory attitude adopted by Chamberlain, war was rendered inevitable; visited South Africa on conclusion of Boer war, 1902; first secretary of state to visit British colony in connexion with political questions; helped forward reconciliation between rival races and parties in Cape Colony and dealt successfully with Boers of Transvaal and capitalists of Rand; vetoed suspension of Cape Colony constitution, 1902; piloted Commonwealth of Australia Bill through House of Commons, 1900; although mainly preoccupied with colonial questions while in unionist government, largely responsible for Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; weakest side of his programme shown in his excursions into foreign policy; resigned office on return from South Africa, 1903; induced to take this step by government's refusal to include in its programme granting of preference to imperial wheat; his conviction of need for closer imperial union, which he believed would most readily be achieved through commercial union, caused him to change his economic policy from free trade to tariff reform; proclaimed himself convinced imperialist at Liverpool, Oct. 1902; devoted himself to explaining and popularizing his views during three years' campaign, 1902-5; obliged to withdraw from public life owing to ill health for remaining years, 1906-14.

Chamberlain's most outstanding qualities were loyalty to his friends and freedom from jealousy. A collected edition of his speeches published 1914. Contributed numerous articles to the 'Fortnightly Review' and 'Nineteenth Century'. A portrait by Frank Holl is in the National Portrait Gallery and there is a bust in Westminster Abbey.
